greatly promoted and its success hastened if the constitutionality of these provisions could be informally determined by the Court of Appeals at his time for the information and guidance of both the Legislature and the executive.

The constitution of several States, notably Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Colorado and Florida, expressly provide that upon the application of the Executive (and in one or two of them spon the application of the Legislature) the highest court of such State shall render an opinion informally upon the constitutionality of any proposed measure pending before the Executive, and information for his official action.

It is to be regretted that some such provision is not contained in the constitution of our own State, but in view of the vast importance of this particular measure, as well as of the dangers which may be avoided, and of the good results which are likely to ensue if a better understanding of the constitutional questions supposed to be involved can be arrived at without litigation, and without further conflict between the Legislature and the Executive, it is believed that the Court of Appeals, upon the joint request of the Legislature and the Executive, would, as a matter of courtesy due from a co-ordinate branch of the State government, readily undertake to examine the proposed measure and informally express an opinion as to the constitutionality of its provisions.
